

Executive Advisory Coaching

“Until only a few years ago, it might have been seen by many in the business world as a sign of weakness to be assisted by a coach—an indication that an executive had many challenges that needed to be overcome. But these days, it often indicates a serious corporate player, someone who is valued by their employer—much in the way an elite athlete is honed and sharpened by a personal trainer.”

“The surge in executive coaching is also a result of the change in organizations, which have shifted from command-and-control management to flatter hierarchies, demanding greater entrepreneurialism, innovation and autonomy from its workers.”
